Tea Drinking in Japan.

Tea was first introduced into Japan by a Buddhist saint, Dungyo Daishi, about the beginning of the Ninth century. But its cultivation made no progress until the Abbot Myoe laid out some plantations at Uji, which are yet the most celebrated in Japan. Though it was freely drunk and used among the upper classes, Mr. Chamberlain, who is an authority, does not think the custom was at all universal among the lower classes until the Seventeenth century.

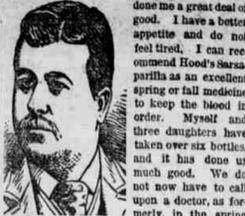

The first tea drinking was indulged in by the Zen sect of Buddhists, simply with the intention of keeping themselves awake during their midnight devotions. The first aristocratic tea drinker of whom there is any record is Monamoto Sanetomo, a shogun, who lived in the Thirteenth century. Earl, a Buddhist abbot, tried to reclaim him from his intemperate habits by inducing him to drink tea instead of sake. The enthusiastic abbot drew up rules to govern the ceremony, which naturally he made religious. First came a very plain, frugal meal, then a service consisting of worshipping departed ancestors, the noisy beating of drums and much burning of incense. Earl also published a book in which he clearly explains how tea benefits the "five viscera"—the heart, liver, lungs, kidneys and intestines.

All That's Claimed

"I had a poor appetite, that tired feeling and was run down, but Hood's Sarsaparilla has done me a great deal of good. I have a better appetite and do not feel tired. I can recommend Hood's Sarsaparilla as an excellent spring or fall medicine to keep the blood in order. Myself and three daughters have taken over six bottles, and it has done us much good. We do not now have to call upon a doctor, as formerly, in the spring time, and I can say that Hood's Sarsaparilla is all that is claimed for it. I most heartily recommend it, and shall always keep it in my house." ALBERT KINNEY, Auburn, Pa.
